AN ENIGMATIC INDO-EUROPEAN RITE: PAEDERASTY

JAN BREMMER

§1. Problem: One of the intriguing features of the Greeks is their active interest in homosexuality. On the whole scholars have been rather reserved in tackling this problem, but in the course of time different solutions have been proposed of which two may be singled out as having received the most support in recent decades. First, the presence of homosexuality is seen as a consequence of the militaristic way of Greek life and parallels have been drawn with cases of homosexuality among soldiers during the second World War. Second, it is seen as a rite of initiation and parallels are adduced from initiatory rites of various “primitive” peoples.

The second solution evidently is the more convincing one, since it at least accounts for the fact that socially approved homosexuality in Greece was virtually restricted to paederasty — an affair between adults and boys — and was not an affair between two adult males. Yet the adherents of this solution have not analysed the structure of Greek paederasty in any depth nor attempted an explanation of this puzzling phenomenon and they have ignored the existence of Indo-European (henceforth: I-E) parallels. For these reasons, while adopting this solution as a working hypothesis, it will be the aim of this article to take a fresh look at the problem of Greek paederasty, paying especially attention to the I-E evidence, as is appropriate in this special issue. As the Ionians had no proper initiatory ritual, at least not since the Archaic Age, we consequently cannot demonstrate that in their case paederasty belonged to the rites of initiation. Therefore we shall mainly restrict our analysis to the Dorian material, but elsewhere we hope to demonstrate that particularly the extensive Athenian evidence can only be understood as a development and transformation of an older form of paederasty which was still to be found among the Darians.

§2. Approach: Since progress in the analysis of the I-E rites of initiation has primarily been made by comparing them to “primitive” ones, we shall first look at the practice of paederasty during “primitive” initiations. Unfortunately, these rites are always guarded in secrecy and the acts of copulation seemingly (understandably?) even more so. Yet, we happen to have a fairly detailed description of the practice among the Papuans of the Trans-Fly by the late English social anthropologist F. E. Williams, who visited the area a number of times between 1926 and 1932. Williams tells us:

It was frequently maintained that setiriva, or bachelors, remained truly celibate until they entered upon sexual relations with their own wives. Without giving too much credence to this statement, we may note that the hospitable exchange above noted was nominally restricted to married adults. Some informants maintained that setiriva could secure the favours of married women at feast times, but it seems evident that this was not definitely sanctioned.

The bachelors had recourse to sodomy, a practice which was not reprobated but was actually a custom of the country -- and a custom in the true sense, i.e., fully sanctioned by male society and universally practised. For a long time the existence of sodomy was successfully concealed from me, but latterly, once I had won the confidence of a few informants in the matter, it was admitted on every hand. It is actually regarded as essential to the growing boy to be sodomized. More than one informant being asked if he had ever been subjected to unnatural practice, answered, 'Why, yes! Otherwise how should I have grown?'

The ceremonial initiation to sodomy and the mythological antecedents to it will be spoken of elsewhere (pp. 194, 308). In the meantime it is enough to note that every male adult in the Morehead district has in his time constantly played both parts in this perversion. The boy is initiated to it at the bull-roarer ceremony and not earlier, for he could not then be trusted to keep the secret from his mother. When he becomes adolescent his part is reversed and he may then sodomize his juniors, the new initiates to the bull-roarer. I am told that some boys are more attractive and consequently receive more attention of this kind than do others; but all must pass through it, since it is regarded as essential to their bodily growth. There is indeed no question as to the universality of the practice.

It is commonly asserted that the early practice of sodomy does nothing to inhibit a man's natural desires when later on he marries; and it is a fact that while the older men are not debarred from indulging, and actually do so at the bull-roarer ceremony, sodomy is virtually restricted as a habit to the setiriva.

This description is confirmed (or at least not contradicted) by other ones and we can thus note the following four points as being important features of the practice:

1) Paederasty is indeed a part of at least some “primitive” initiations and should not be confused with homosexuality, since both initiators and novices will afterwards normally enter the married state.

2) Copulation, in which the novice is always the passive partner, takes place anally.\(^7\)

3) The active paederasts are last-time novices. Brellich (93) already observed that the novices of the previous turn usually play a prominent rôle in giving instruction, as in Sparta (Calame I, 392), and in keeping discipline. We shall see below whether paederasty is connected with either of these two activities.

4) There is some uneasiness about the whole affair, since it is kept secret.

These four points we shall take as a guiding-line in our analysis of the I-E evidence. At first sight such an investigation hardly looks promising. Our knowledge of the I-E rites of initiation is still (and perhaps always will be) rather restricted,\(^8\) and the conversion to Christianity, which considered homosexuality a most serious vice,\(^9\) would early have suppressed the practice, wherever it may have existed among the peoples of Western and Eastern Europe. And yet, there is some evidence which, perhaps not unsurprisingly, has been analysed insufficiently. Our contribution can hardly be more than a first exploration of this material, since no study of the I-E evidence has been made so far, but it will at least present more material than can be found anywhere else.

In the actual analysis we shall proceed as follows. First, we shall present the material, then we shall give an evaluation and finally attempt an explanation of the phenomenon of paederasty in the rites of initiation.
§3. Survey: Since no information seems to be available about the early Indians, we pass straight on to the Persians. Our sources are divided as to whether they practiced paederasty or not. The latter view will be the more probable one, since the Zoroastrian writings time and again strongly forbid paederasty. It is perhaps indicative for this attitude that Agesilaos, although strongly in love with the son of a high-ranking Persian, refrains from any physical contact. On the other hand, the son of Pharnabazus is enamoured of a Greek boy, and the recurrence of the prohibitions of paederasty suggests that the Persians did not succeed in stopping the practice.

Such discrepancy between theory and practice could elucidate the remark of Herodotus that the Persians learned paederasty from the Greeks. Apart from the problem as to how Herodotus or his source could have possibly known this, we can reject this as utterly improbable since paederasty is almost universal (Karsch-Haack, passim). Nevertheless, this notice can still be valuable in a different way, for it seems characteristic that peoples who themselves practice paederasty impute this to others. Thus the Athenians called paederasty “doing it the Spartan way” or the “Chalcidian way”; Plautus calls a paederast an “Ionian” and the Albanians (below) called the gypsies paederasts. The information of Herodotus would fit into this pattern: his source may well have been Persians who felt uneasy about the practice and wanted to disclaim responsibility for their fellow countrymen’s behavior. It seems reasonable then to accept the occurrence of paederasty among the Persians—it was forbidden—but our sources do not connect the practice with initiation or men’s societies.

As regards Greece we will start with the Spartans, looking specifically for the different points enumerated in §2. The existence of a close connection between initiation and paederasty is demonstrated by the words of Xenophon in his discussion of the Spartan agōgē: “I think I ought to say something also about intimacy with boys, since this matter also has a bearing on education (paideian).” The fact is confirmed by Plutarch who adds that at the age of twelve the boys received lovers who were chosen from the reputable young men (neoi). This institutionalized rôle of the paederasty also clearly appears from the fact that the ephors penalized those who, although qualifying, did not have a beloved.

A rather complicated problem is the Spartan mode of copulation. Xenophon elaborately tells us:

If someone, being himself an honest man, admired a boy's soul and tried to make of him an ideal friend without reproach and to associate with him, he approved, and believed in the excellence of this kind of training. But if it was clear that the attraction lay in the boy’s outward beauty, he banned the connexion as an abomination; and thus he purged the relationship of all impurity, so that in Lucedaemon it resembled parental and brotherly love. I am not surprised, however, that people refuse to believe this. For in many states the laws are not opposed to the indulgence of these appetites.

The apologetic tone of Xenophon suggests that he was making a concession to the changing taste of his Athenian public, since our Athenian sources on the whole thought otherwise. A comedian (Dover 187) even coined the word _kusolakon_ “anus-Spartan,” which leaves little to the imagination, but from a methodological point of view it is dubious, as Dover (194) rightly stresses, to accept without reflection the Athenian allegations against Sparta. For the comedians, our principal source, were more concerned with good jokes than with faithfully reporting other peoples’ customs. Bethe, in a celebrated article, suggested another piece of evidence. According to him the Spartan word for the male lover, _eispnelas_, should be explained as “in-blower” of seed. Yet, there is absolutely no proof whatsoever that the Spartans understood it this way and therefore his explanation must remain pure conjecture. Strictly speaking we cannot but conclude that there does not exist any certainty about the Spartan way of copulation.

Yet, this is unduly sceptical, for we know with certainty that on the island of Thera, a Spartan colony, the relations were not at all Platonic. A graffito of the early sixth century reads: “By (Apollo) Delphinios, Krimon here copulated with a boy, brother of Bathykles.” This graffito had already been adduced as evidence by Bethe and Jeanmaire, but it is only recently that we are properly able to understand its significance. Three important points should be made. First, the existence of anal copulation can hardly be doubted. Second, the invocation of Apollo Delphinios points, as Fritz Graf (13) has shown, to a connection with initiation. Third, Dover (123) has rightly pointed out that the person who wrote this graffito intended slander. This must mean that, as in Athens (Dover 146), so also in this community some people felt uneasy about paederasty.

We complete our Dorian picture with the description Ephoros gives of paederasty in Crete:
They (i.e., the Cretans) have a peculiar custom in regard to love affairs, for they win the objects of their love, not by persuasion, but by capture (harpagēi); the lover tells the friends of the boy three or four days beforehand that he is going to make the capture; but for the friends to conceal the boy, or not to let him go forth by the appointed road, is indeed a most disgraceful thing, a confession, as it were, that the boy is unworthy to obtain such a lover; and when they meet, if the abductor is the boy's equal or superior in rank or other respects, the friends pursue him and lay hold of him, though only in a very gentle way, thus satisfying the custom (to nomimon); and after that they cheerfully turn the boy over to him to lead away; if, however, the abductor is unworthy, they take the boy away from him. And the pursuit does not end until the boy is taken to the men's house (andreion) of his abductor. They regard as a worthy object of love, not the boy who is exceptionally handsome, but the boy who is exceptionally manly and decorous. After giving the boy presents, the abductor takes him away to any place in the country he wishes; and those who are present at the capture follow after them and after feasting and hunting with them for two months (for it is not permitted to detain the boy for a longer time), they return to the city. The boy is released after receiving as presents a military habit, an ox, and a drinking cup (these are the gifts required by law, nomon), and other things so numerous and costly that the friends, on account of the number of the expenses, make contributions thereto. Now the boy sacrifices the ox to Zeus and feasts those who returned with him; and then he makes known the facts about his intimacy with his lover, whether perchance, it has pleased him or not, the law (nomou) allowing him this privilege in order that, if any force was applied to him at the time of his capture, he might be able at this feast to avenge himself and be rid of the lover. It is disgraceful for those who are handsome in appearance and also are descendants of illustrious ancestors to fail to obtain lovers. ... So much for their customs (nomima) in regard to love affairs.

Before we look at the paeaderasty in particular we will first analyse this ritual in general. The whole affair starts with an obvious agreement between the lover, whose age remains unspecified, and the friends of the boy: they guide the boy to an agreed place where the lover will be waiting. Such a set-up is typical for the start of the initiation and finds its exact parallel in “primitive” initiations.\textsuperscript{35} The term Ephoros uses for the capture, \textit{harpagē}, was evidently a \textit{terminus technicus}, for it is also used for the capture of Chrysippus by Laius\textsuperscript{36} and of Ganymedes by Zeus.\textsuperscript{37}

The boy offers a token resistance and the pursuit ends in his lover’s \textit{andreion}, which shows that the ritual was sanctioned by the community, since the \textit{andreion} was the public mess.\textsuperscript{38} Here the boy received presents the size of which may have depended on the status difference between the lover and himself. It is typical of the archaic character of this ritual that presents play such an important rôle.\textsuperscript{39} First, the boy received presents in the \textit{andreion}, then he received presents from his own friends and his lover at the end of his “bushtime” and finally he in turn feasted “those who return with him.” This last gesture finds its close parallel in the academic custom that the \textit{promovendus} gives a dinner to his supervisor and others who have helped him after having received his doctorate, a custom still existing in Germany and Holland at the present day and going back to the earliest Middle Ages.\textsuperscript{40}

After the presents were given the whole group spent two months in the country, eating and hunting. Hunting is the activity \textit{par excellence} to prove the valor of the initiand\textsuperscript{41} and as such an important part of the “primitive” initiations (Brelich 77) and initiatory scenario’s in fairy tales.\textsuperscript{42} On their return to the city the lover, with the financial help of the boy’s friends, presented the boy with a military suit, an ox and a wine-cup. What, we may ask, is the relevance of these presents? The present of the military suit evidently meant that the boy had now become a man, for in Thebes the lover made his beloved a present of such a suit when he registered as a man.\textsuperscript{43} The ox reminds us of the lifting of the bull by Theseus and the Athenian adolescents, the ephebes: a connection with the final stage of the initiation (Graf 14f.). But why the cup? The only thing known about the cup is that in Gortyn it resembled a \textit{therikleios},\textsuperscript{44} a cup used in symposia.\textsuperscript{45} Gernet\textsuperscript{46} considers it to be an “instrument de libation et ‘objet précieux’,” but this is hardly enough. It was a present prescribed by law which indicates that it must have had a more central meaning. Evidently the military suit and the ox were closely connected with the final stage of the initiation and it seems therefore reasonable to look for such a significance for the cup, too. Gernet\textsuperscript{47} himself had already pointed to the Oenisteria, a ceremony for the moment the ephebes have their long hair cut off, i.e., when they enter the final stage of the transition from adolescence into adulthood.
In this ceremony they offer a cup to Heracles and give a drink to their companions, presumably at their own cost as Gernet persuasively suggests, which reminds us of the meal offered by the Cretan initiand.

Why this connection between drinking and the final stage of the initiation? Drinking wine played an important part in the existence of Greek men as appears from the central place of the symposium.\textsuperscript{48} This is even reflected in the way in which Greeks looked at neighboring peoples, for whereas Greeks themselves drank mixed wine, they ascribed the drinking of unmixed wine, milk, or water to others. In many Greek cities women were forbidden to drink wine.\textsuperscript{49} In Rome women,\textsuperscript{50} slaves\textsuperscript{51} and, for our problem very important, young men until the age of thirty\textsuperscript{52} were prohibited from drinking wine. It seems therefore reasonable to conclude that the present of the drinking-cup meant admission as a qualified member to the world of adult men.\textsuperscript{53}

The assumption that young men were not yet allowed to drink wine probably also explains the fact that among the Romans wine-pourers were youths of noble birth.\textsuperscript{54} We find a similar function for youths of Greece such as the young noblemen at Greek symposia,\textsuperscript{55} the son of Menelaus,\textsuperscript{56} the young Euripides,\textsuperscript{57} Larichos\textsuperscript{58} (the brother of Sappho), the boys at the Ephesian festival for Poseidon,\textsuperscript{59} and the wine-pourers of Alexander\textsuperscript{60} and Pyrrhus;\textsuperscript{61} the fact that they had to pour out the wine but were not allowed to drink it stressed the difference of status between them and the adult men.

The mythical counterpart of these boys is Ganymedes, the wine-pourer of Zeus. The place in the Troad where Zeus supposedly captured him was significantly called Harpagia\textsuperscript{62} (above), but in the Cretan version the abductor was Minos, although the name of the place remained the same: Harpagias.\textsuperscript{63} The Chalcidians, on the other hand, claimed that the capture happened in their territory at a place called Harpagion, and there has indeed recently been found a statue of Ganymedes in their area.\textsuperscript{64} It was precisely this Ganymedes who was the beloved of Zeus, as numerous testimonia tell us.\textsuperscript{65}

Finally it is important to note that being captured by a lover was a \textit{must}, since it was considered a disgrace not to have one.\textsuperscript{66} It is therefore completely understandable that Plutarch calls the practice the "so-called capture" (\textit{harpagnós}).\textsuperscript{67}

As we turn from ritual back to paederasty as such, two points may be observed. First, paederasty in Crete is clearly part of the initiatory ritual. Second, the whole ritual is subjected to the supervision of society as a whole, as can be inferred from the frequent occurrence of the words nomos and nomimon in the report of Ephoros. Unfortunately, the lengthy report does not inform us of the other features of the practice in which we are interested. And yet, we are not altogether without additional data.

Regarding the age of the erastēs, "lover," we are informed by an anecdote related by Aelianus. A Cretan warrior, who had a boy of noble birth as his paidika — one of the Greek terms for the beloved (Dover 16f.) — stumbled during a fight over a dead body and fell. When an enemy wanted to strike him in the back the man exclaimed: "Do not deal me a shameful and cowardly blow, but strike me in front," in the breast, in order that my loved one may not judge me guilty of cowardice and refrain from laying out my dead body" (tr. Scholfield [Loeb]). The warrior is called a neanias, "young man," which nicely agrees with what we were led to expect on account of the "primitive" and Spartan evidence.

What about the nature of copulation? Again, we have no direct information but it seems to fit in with the other evidence that a poem glorifying the derrière of a boy is written by the Cretan Rhianos. As regards the existence of ambiguous feelings about paederasty we have no information.

The Cretan relationships were felt to be rather shocking by the Romans and an embarrassed Nepos notes: "In Crete it is considered praiseworthy for the young men to have as many lovers as possible." The Romans even thought that paederasty was one of the main causes for the Greek enslavement. Yet, Valerius Maximus presents a number of stories, the earliest going back to the fourth century, demonstrating that the practice was known to the Romans too, albeit disapproved of till the end of the Republic. By that time, paederastic friendships were frequently adopted in higher circles and even the moralistic Augustus had had his friend in his younger years. About the Empire we need not go into detail. Any reader of Juvenal, Martial and Petronius can find examples galore.

However, during the Republic one case of homosexuality occurred which deserves special attention. From Livy's account of the suppression of the Bacchanalia scandal in 186 B.C., we learn that adolescents, when being initiated in the Bacchic mysteries, had to submit to a homosexual act, a submission untested for the Greek Dionysiac mysteries. Festugiére has rejected the notice as slander. Even if this is the case, something which has to remain undecided in the absence of other testimonies, the report would still be valuable in showing the existence, on the level of collective representations, of the connection between initiation and submission to a homosexual act.
It is important to observe that the Romans explicitly forbid paederasty with free boys but not with slaves in the so-called lex Scantinia, a law dating probably from before Cicero’s time. The practice was evidently considered to be a humiliating one and thus fit only for slaves. The active rôle in the relationship, however, was beyond reproach, as follows from the fact that orators, such as Gaius Gracchus and Cicero, only slandered their opponents by suggesting a passive rôle in a paederastic relationship.

Regarding the Celts, there is general agreement in our sources that they practiced paederasty. Athenaeus even tells us that they often slept with two boys at the same time, but this looks as if it is a typical Greek dream-wish. This is the only detailed report we have that goes beyond the pure mention of the practice and the possibility cannot be excluded that it is just one of those features ascribed by the Greeks to the Randvölker to contrast them unfavourably with themselves. Early Irish and Welsh literature has no mention of the practice at all.

To the ancient Germans also paederasty was ascribed. We may suspect that for those sources that do not give any precise information the same attitude as regards the Celts exists, but there are others which deserve a closer inspection. Tacitus tells us that those who are corpore infames were thrown into a marsh. This points to a contempt of homosexuals. Tacitus gives no other precise information, but from the Icelandic sagas we learn that this contempt is directed exclusively at the passive partner in a homosexual relationship. How the Germans imagined this relationship clearly appears from the words of Skeggi in the Gísla saga (c.2) when directing a carpenter to make wooden figures of Gisli and Kolbjorn: “and have one stand close behind the other; and the nastiness of that will always be there to shame them” (tr. G. Johnston).

For our purpose two other texts are of great importance. Procopius relates of the Heruli that they practiced homosexuality. It is evident that he pictures the Heruli as a kind of exceptionally bad rogues, and the possibility therefore cannot be excluded that this is just pure slander. On the other hand we must note that the Heruli practiced a kind of initiation, for we also learn from Procopius that a distinction existed between the lords and the youths whom he calls doulai, literally “slaves.” The young men had to fight without a shield and only received one after having demonstrated their courage. Otto Höfler already noted that the word “slave” must have a special meaning, and recently Widengren has succeeded in giving a proper explanation. He showed that terms such as “slave, servant, etc.,” when used for young men and warriors, are typical of the Gefolgschaftswesen, itself often a development of the men’s societies.97 The Heruli evidently were in the process of such a development, since the obligation to show courage is typical for novices. Since the Heruli knew a kind of initiation, it is quite possible to assume that paederasty constituted a part of it, but in the light of Procopius’ aversion of them this must remain uncertain; not so, however, our next case.

Ammianus Marcellinus98 tells us that among the Taifali, a tribe connected with the Goths,99 the boys lived in a state of paederasty until they had killed a boar or a bear. The killing of a boar was a typical heroic ordeal,100 and had also initiatory value in Macedonia, where a man could only recline at dinner, i.e., have the status of an adult, when he had speared a boar without a hunting-net. The rule was still retained in Alexander’s time, since Cassander had to sit at the table at the age of thirty-five, because he had not yet speared his boar.101 As the paederastic relationship continued only till the boy reached adulthood, it seems reasonable to consider this case similar to those we have observed with the Greeks, although Germanic scholars have consistently tried to explain it away or have considered it slander.102

We have now arrived at our final example. In 1894 Von Hahn103 noted a strong resemblance between the Dorian customs and those in Albania. This is a highly important observation — although, except for Bethe,104 no attention has been paid to it — since, if anywhere in Europe archaic customs remained alive till nearly the present day, it was precisely in this highly remote and mountainous105 area.106 The paederastic relationships were between boys from the age of twelve and adolescents from the age of sixteen: a striking resemblance with the “primitive” and Dorian relationships. Unfortunately, we are not told whether the practice was supposed to have educational goals, but the relationship was sanctioned by society: the pair of lovers together took the eucharist.107

As regards the other features in which we are interested, there is one other, if curious, source. In 1904 the folklorist F. R. Krauss started a journal for scientific study of scatology which was only sold to libraries and responsible scholars.108 In this journal he also published, besides countless erotic stories, lists of erotic vocabulary of most of the European countries. From a list of Albanian words109 I take the following: “būthar = paederast (literally: ‘Arshman’).” The word may speak for itself. Another extract from the list makes apparent the Albanian attitude towards paederasty: “madzüp, eig. = Zigeuner; davon die Albiteugen madzūpi = Päderastie; madzūpoj = Päderastie üben.” Whereas the Albanians were themselves convinced paederasts they denounced the gypsies for paederasty. This ambiguous attitude is also apparent in Von Hahn's report, since his source, a young Albanian, assured him that the relationships were fully Platonic, whereas the great Balkanologist Weigand\textsuperscript{110} could assure Bethe that nothing was further from the truth! It seems reasonable then to recognize in Albanian paederasty the same pattern as we have found among "primitive" and Dorian initiations.

§4.\textit{Evaluation}: Comparing the Greek, Germanic and Albanian evidence we can note the following points. Among the Greeks and ancient Germans paederasty belonged to the transitional period into adulthood, as was the case among the Albanians. Among the Greeks and Albanians the active paederasts were young men, if not adolescents. Anal copulation seems certain for Greeks and Albanians, and, considering the attitude of the ancient Germans regarding passive homosexuals, it seems reasonable to postulate that adult men would not have acted thus — which suggests that the young boys had to submit to the passive rôle. Ambiguous feelings we have noted for Greeks and Albanians, and among the ancient Germans, a strong condemnation of passive homosexuality.

Admittedly, our material is scarce, but all the evidence we have coincides to a striking degree with the features we noted for "primitive" paederasty during initiation. For that reason it seems not unreasonable to arrive at the conclusion that paederasty, like other features of "primitive" initiation, once constituted a part of the I-E initiation. Having accepted this conclusion, we shall now proceed to attempt an explanation of the practice.

§5.\textit{Explanation}: It is sometimes forgotten that our I-E evidence in fact constitutes the oldest historical evidence for initiatory practices, on the whole about 2500 years earlier than much ethnographic material. Our "primitive" material concerning paederasty is exclusively restricted to Melanesia, New Guinea and neighbouring regions,\textsuperscript{111} a marginal area compared with the rest of the world, where we can expect to find the more archaic features of social institutions. Consequently, paederasty will belong to the oldest historical strata of the initiatory ritual.

From the evidence presented it seems clear that often mixed feelings exist about the practice. In addition we should note that, if a distinction is made between the passive and the active rôle, it is the passive rôle which is considered to be despicable, a feeling which indeed seems to be very widespread.\textsuperscript{112}
Why, however, is it the passive rôle which is despised and not the active one? Here, I suggest, we can be helped by a socio-biological approach. This is, admittedly, a new branch of the social sciences, and its results are still a source of profound disension, but some insights can hardly be refuted. One of these insights is of special importance for our theme. The German ethologist I. Eibl-Eibesfeldt has noted: "Bei sehr vielen Säugern reiten Männchen zur Rangdemonstration agressiven Charakter auf Artgenossen des gleichen Geschlechts auf." Fehling (18-27), in an excellent discussion of the subject, has collected many historical examples of this kind of Rangdemonstration, which continued to exist up to the recent past, especially as a penalty for intruders or adulterers. I shall therefore confine myself to one example, albeit a ritualized one, which is not mentioned by Fehling. In a review of a study of the notorious Attica revolt in 1972 we are told that long before the showdown, while observers swore to the hostages' safety, wild stories multiplied baroquely in the peaceful New York countryside of rape and sexual humiliations (!) and castration inflicted on the hostages. The stories were not true; but they prepared the guards for 'reparative' sexual fiendishness when the prisoners were retaken — one was prodded back to his cell with a screwdriver up his rectum. No doubt the guards who did this, or watched it being done, thought it a mild and fitting return for all the outrages that had filled their dreams during those four days when few people slept easy around Attica.

Now Rangdemonstration is exactly the feature which we would expect in the initiatory ritual, since the novices have to be shown their modest place in the hierarchy, and to that end they are continually humiliated. As Raymond Firth notes concerning Tikopia initiation: "The suppression of the individual, the disregard of his normal freedom of choice is important...; at initiation, he must submit." This accent on obedience can be found in Greece too. Both Cretan and Spartan initiation stress obedience and the young boys are likened to unruly foals which have to be domesticated. This, in turn, explains why we found that the active padeasts were the novices of the previous initiation, for they, as we have seen above, were charged with the keeping of discipline.

On the other hand, the fact that the passive rôle was considered to be humiliating will explain the early disappearance of the practice among the Indo-Iranians and the Romans. As soon as the initiation proper disappeared or became transformed, the practice of paederasty must have come under heavy censure, which normally will have led to its disappearance.

Our explanation then has accounted for all the features of paederasty during the initiation. However, it would be less than fair if we did not point out that other scholars have approximated this explanation. Already in 1909 (!) Arnold van Gennep\textsuperscript{120} compared what he termed the homosexual practices of Melanesian novices with those of Greek ephesians. More recently Lionel Tiger\textsuperscript{121} hesitantly suggested a connection between the occurrence of homo-erotic practices during initiation and the mounting by dominant male primates of subdominant ones. This aspect was elaborated in a detailed way by Fehling (21), but the Greek parallel escaped him.

We would like to close this article with an observation on method in I-E studies. Georges Dumézil\textsuperscript{122} once scornfully rejected the use of Melanesian parallels, as adduced by my compatriot Wagenvoort, to acquire a better understanding of the Roman terms \textit{gravitas} and \textit{maiestas}. Yet, our analysis has, I believe, demonstrated that such a comparison can (though it need not) be useful. Both cultures represent more archaic stages of human civilization at a time when cultures were less differentiated in themselves and from one another as compared with more modern times. Similarly, Karl Meuli\textsuperscript{123} had succeeded in explaining many features of Greek sacrificial ritual by a comparison with another marginal culture: the Siberian hunting peoples. A corollary therefore suggests itself: that I-E scholars ought not to restrict themselves to studying only the I-E material, but must ever be prepared to look for explanations to “primitive” materials as well, in particular the practices of more marginal societies.

\textbf{APPENDIX}

\textbf{INITIATION AND LESBIAN LOVE}

Plutarch\textsuperscript{124} relates that in Sparta the noble women loved the girls. Also the Academic philosopher Hagnon\textsuperscript{125} states: “Among the Spartans it was customary (viz. for adult women) to have intercourse with girls before their marriage, as one did with boys.” And Calame (II) has shown that some poems of Alcman\textsuperscript{126} clearly show a connection between initiation of the girls and Lesbian love. It may therefore be considered proven that male paederasty in Sparta had a Lesbian relationship as its counterpart.
in female initiation. In the case of Sappho\textsuperscript{127} the same ritual background is still visible.

However, when looking at the quite extensive "primitive" evidence of Lesbian love, as collected by Karsch-Haack (449-511), or at general discussions of female initiation\textsuperscript{128} we do not find any parallel for Spartan behavior. This may be due to the secretive nature of the female ritual, which in any case has yet to be properly analyzed. But it may well be the case that in Greece Lesbian love in initiation developed after the analogy with male paeoderasty. Indicative of such a development seems to be the fact that the term for the female beloved, \textit{aitis},\textsuperscript{129} is taken from the male sphere. Unfortunately, our data are too scarce for any further detailed investigation.

\textit{The Center for Hellenic Studies}
\textit{Washington, D.C.}

\section*{NOTES}

\begin{itemize}
\item I would like to thank all those scholars who kindly answered my requests for information, Fritz Graf for his comments, and Rolf Bremmer for the revision of my English. I also thank Professor H. T. Wallinga and his seminar for their critical attention to my first exposition of these views.

The following studies will be quoted by their author’s name only: F. Karsch-Haack, \textit{Das gleichgeschlechtliche Leben der Naturvolker} (München 1911); A. Brelich, \textit{Paides e parthenoi} (Rome 1969); D. Fehling, \textit{Ethologische Überlegungen auf dem Gebiet der Altertumskunde} (München 1974); C. Calame, \textit{Les chœurs de jeunes filles en grèce archaïque} (Rome 1977); K. J. Dover, \textit{Greek Homosexuality} (London 1978); "Apollo Delphinios," \textit{Museum Helveticum} 36 (1979) 2-22.

\textsuperscript{1} The best survey of the evidence, with an excellent bibliography, is Dover. Although his study is full of excellent \textit{Einzelbeobachtungen}, it does not succeed in presenting a coherent picture. Moreover, it is rather unhistorical, entitling the chapter on the Dorians, by all accounts the more archaic tribe, "Changes."

\textsuperscript{2} Cp. Dover 185; see, e.g., H. -I. Marrou, \textit{Histoire de l’éducation dans l’antiquité}, 1948\textsuperscript{1} (Paris 1965\textsuperscript{5}) 63.

\textsuperscript{3} See especially Brelich 35, 84ff., 120ff.; Calame I, 421 / 7.

\textsuperscript{4} In this yet unpublished study I shall discuss relationships such as those between Socrates Alcibiades, which are, as I hope to demonstrate, a development of the paeoderastic ones.

\textsuperscript{5} F. E. Williams, \textit{Papuans of the Trans-Fly} (Oxford 1969\textsuperscript{3}) 158f.

\textsuperscript{6} Surely by anal copulation; cp. Williams (309) on the mythological first occasion: "Gambadi informants describe the initial occasion more vividly. The father bids his son stoop to drink and as he does so catches him at a disadvantage."
\end{itemize}
This is also observed by Brelich 85. There seems to be one exception; cp. H. P. Dürr, Traum-zeit (Frankfurt 1978) 89: “... bei der Initiation auf einer kleinen melanesischen Insel legen sich die erwachsenen Männer auf den Bauch und bieten den Initianten ihren After dar.” Unfortunately, the author does not give any specific reference which would enable us to determine the meaning and place of this behavior.

10 Cp. R. Schmidt, Liebe und Ehe imalten und modernen Indien (Berlin 1904). I owe this reference to Professor J. Gonda.

12 Plato Sypm. 182b; Curt. 10.1.26; Amm. Marc. 23.6.76.

13 Vendidad 8.32; Dādistān 70.7; Denkart 8.35.13; E. Westermarck, The Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas (London 1908) II, 486f.

16 Her. 1.135.

17 Hesch. A 224 and 226; Suda A 62.

18 Hesch. X 85 Schmidt; Suda X 42.

20 Professor Geo Widengren, letter 10 / 22 / 79.

22 Plut. Lyc. 17.1

23 Ael. PH. 3.10.

27 Cp. Henderson (above, note 26) 131 n. 123: “kuros = anus (Hsch.) is used by comic poets only of the male anus and only in the abuse of paederasts.”

29 For eisplēnas (or -os) and eisplēn, cp. Theocr. 12.13 and schol. ad loc; Call. fr. 68Pf.; Plut. Ag. 24 and Cle. 3; Ael. PH. 3.12; Choerob. in Theod. 166.33; Et. Gen. sv. eisplēn; EM 43.31 and 306.22.

30 IG XII 537.

31 Bethe (above, note 28) 449f., 453.

32 H. Jeanmaire, Courfoil et courêtes (Lille 1939) 456-460.

33 Ephoros FGH 70 F149 (= Strabo 10.4.21), tr. Jones (Loeb, slightly amended).

34 This must mean that the friends can hardly have been the ones of the lover, as is supposed 35 See my observations in M. J. Vermaseren (ed.), Studies in Hellenistic Religions, EPRO 78 (Leiden 1979) 15f.

36 Athenaeus 13.603A; Apollod. 3.3.5. According to Praxilla (fr. 751P), who uses the same term, Zeus carried him off.

37 Ibycus fr. 289P; Thgn. 1347.

38 Graf 11, with all references; add A. J. Beattie, Kadmos 14 (1975) 43-47.

43 Plut. M. 761B.

44 Athen. 11.502B.

45 Athen. 11.470 / 2.

46 Gernet (above, note 34) 190.

49 On the whole subject of wine, see the fundamental study by F. Graf, Milch, Honig und Wein. Zum Verständnis der Libation im griechischen Ritual, in Perennitas, Studi in memoria di Angelo Brelich (Rome 1980). For water-drinking neighbours, see also the ancient Germans (Athen. 4.153E), Thracians (Plato Leg. 637E) and the, regards the mainland of Greece, marginal Euboeans (Apollodoros fr. 281K). The theme of the water-drinking Scythians (Aphiphanes fr. 35K) is again taken up by Asterius hom. XIV.11 Datema, but the topos has not been recognized by O. J. Maench-Helfen, Die Welt der Hunnen (Wien 1978) 144, who sees in the notice a reference to the behavior of the contemporary Huns.

51 Athen. 10.429B.

52 Athen. 10.429B. Ael. VH. 2.38 states as age thirty-five.

54 Athen. 10.425A.

56 Od. 15.141; note also II. 1.470.

57 Theophr. fr. 119; Hieronymus fr. 28 Wehrli.

58 Sappho fr. 203LP = 203 Voigt.

59 Amerias apud Athen. 10.424F.

60 D.S. 12.14.5.

61 Plut. Pyrr. 5.

65
62 Strabo 13.1.11.
63 Echemenes FGH 459 F1; Dosiadas FGH 458 F5.
66 Cp. Athen. 11.782B; Cicero apud Serv. Aen. 10.325.
67 Plut. M.11F.
68 Ael. HA. 4.1.
69 For wounds in the front as honorable ones, cp. D.S. 15.33.6; Plut. Ant. 43, Cat. Ma. 1, Crass. 11, Pel. 4.
70 AP. 12.38.
71 Nep. Pro. 4.
72 Plut. M.274D.
73 Val. Max. 6.1.7ff.
76 Liv. 39.10.8 and 39.13.10.
79 We may compare the stereotyped connection between cannibalism and secret societies, cp. W. Burkert, Homo necans (Berlin / New York 1972) 47, and N. Cohn, Europe's Inner Demons (London 1975) passim.
80 Plut. M. 288A.
82 Plut. CG. 4.4.
84 Aris. Pol. 2.6.6; Posidon. FGH 87 F116 (= D.S. 5.32.7); Strabo 4.4.6; Pto. Tetr. 2.3; Bardesanes liber legum regionum, p.592f. Nau = (in Greek translation) Eus. PE. 6.10.
85 Athen. 13.603E.
87 Brinley Rees, letter 12 / 5 / 79.
88 Sext. Emp. P. 3.199; Bardesanes (above, note 84).
89 Tac. Germ. 12.
An Enigmatic Indo-European Rite: Paederasty

G. Widengren, Der Feudalismus im alten Iran (Köln 1969) 9-44, 50f.

Amm. Marc. 31.9.5: Hanc Tafalorum gentem turpem ac obscenae vitae flagitia ita accepimus mersam, ut apud eos nefandi concubitus foedere copulentur maribus puberes, aetas viri ditem in eorum pollutis usibus consumpturi. Porro siqu iam adultus aprum exceperit solus, vel interemerit ursum immanem, colluvione liberatur incesti.

Hegesandros apud Athen. 1.18A.

Bethe, Dorische Knabenliebe, 475.

This is stressed by virtually every study of Albania. For a useful bibliography, cp.I. Whitaker apud I. M. Lewis (ed.), History and Social Anthropology (London 1968) 288-293.

Weigand apud Bethe, Dorische Knabenliebe, 475.

As can be inferred from Karsch-Haack 91-115; Brelich 85; A. Dundes, Man 11 (1976), 233f.

Eibl-Eibesfeldt, quoted by Fehling 18.

R. Firth, We the Tikopia (London 1959) 466.

Ephoros loc. cit. = Strabo 10.4.20.
117 Plut. Lyc. 16 and Cle. 9.
118 Calame I, 374f; add Plut. Ages. 1.
120 L. Tiger, Men in Groups, 1969¹ (London 1971) 147.
121 G. Dumézil, "Maestias et gravitas: de quelques différences entre les Romains et les Austronienses" (I), RPh 26 (1952) 7-28 = (slightly abbreviated but with a new preface) Idées romaines (Paris 1969) 125-152. Wagenvoort's reply (Mnem. IV 5 [1953] 287-306) is reprinted in H. Wagenvoort, Pietas. Selected Studies in Roman Religion = "Studies in Greek 123 Plut. Lyc. 18.
124 Hagnon apud Athen. 13.602D. I follow Calame (I.434), as against G. Devereux, SO 42
(1968) 83f. (who is followed by Dover 188), in not seeing in this text anal intercourse of boys with girls.
125 Alcman fr. 1 and 3P.
126 Calame II, 94-97; see also R. Merkelbach, "Sappho und ihr Kreis," Philologus 101 (1957)
1-29 = C. Calame (ed.), Rito e poesia orale in Grecia (Rome 1977) 123-136, 214f.; B. Gentili, 127 Cp: A. Winterstein, "Die Pubertätsriten der Mädchen mit deren Spuren in Märchen," Imago
14 (1928) 199-274; J. K. Brown, "A cross-cultural study of female initiation rites," Am. Anthroprop. 65 (1963) 837-853; D. Visca, Le iniziazioni femminili: un problema de recon-siderare, Religioni e civilità 2 (1976) 241-274; N. J. Girardot, "Initiation and Meaning in the Tale of Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," Am. J. Folklore 90 (1977) 274-300.
128 References: Calame I, 435 n.173.