The Development of Western Civilization

Narrative Essays in the History of Our Tradition from Its Origins in Ancient Israel and Greece to the Present

Edited by Edward W. Fox
Professor of Modern European History
Cornell University

THE AGE OF POWER

BY CARL J. FRIEDRICH and CHARLES BLITZER
The Age of Power

CARL J. FRIEDRICH
HARVARD UNIVERSITY

AND

CHARLES BLITZER
SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

* * *

Cornell University Press
ITHACA AND LONDON
Foreword

THE proposition that each generation must rewrite history is more widely quoted than practiced. In the field of college texts on western civilization, the conventional accounts have been revised, and sources and supplementary materials have been developed; but it is too long a time since the basic narrative has been rewritten to meet the rapidly changing needs of new college generations. In the mid-twentieth century such an account must be brief, well written, and based on unquestioned scholarship and must assume almost no previous historical knowledge on the part of the reader. It must provide a coherent analysis of the development of western civilization and its basic values. It must, in short, constitute a systematic introduction to the collective memory of that tradition which we are being asked to defend. This series of narrative essays was undertaken in an effort to provide such a text for an introductory history survey course and is being published in the present form in the belief that the requirements of that one course reflected a need that is coming to be widely recognized.

Now that the classic languages, the Bible, the great historical novels, even most non-American history, have dropped out of the normal college preparatory program, it is imperative that a text in the history of European civilization be fully self-explanatory. This means not only that it must begin at the beginning, with the origins of our civilization in ancient Israel and Greece, but that it must introduce every name or event that takes an integral place in the account and ruthlessly delete all others no matter how firmly imbedded in historical protocol. Only thus simplified and complete will the narrative present a sufficiently clear outline of those major trends and developments that have led from the beginning of our recorded time to the most pressing of our current problems. This simplification, however, need not involve intellectual dilution or evasion. On the contrary, it can effectively raise rather than lower the level of presentation. It is on this assumption that the present series has been based, and each contributor has been urged to write for a mature and literate audience. It is hoped, therefore, that the essays may also prove profitable and rewarding to readers outside the college classroom.

The plan of the first part of the series is to sketch, in related essays, the narrative of our history from its origins to the eve of the French Revolution; each is to be written by a recognized scholar and is designed to serve as the basic reading for one week in a semester course. The developments of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries will be covered in a succeeding series which will provide the same quantity of reading material for each week of the second semester. This scale of presentation has been adopted in the conviction that any understanding of the central problem of the preservation of the integrity and dignity of the individual human being depends first on an examination of the origins of our tradition in the politics and philosophy of the ancient Greeks and the religion of the ancient Hebrews and then on a relatively more detailed knowledge of its recent development within our industrial urban society.

The decision to devote equal space to twenty-five centuries and to a century and a half was based on analogy with the human memory. Those events most remote tend to be remembered in least detail but often with a sense of clarity and perspective that is absent in more recent and more crowded recollections. If the roots of our tradition must be identified, their relation to the present must be carefully developed. The nearer the narrative approaches contemporary times, the more difficult and complicated this becomes. Recent experience must be worked over more carefully and in more detail if it is to contribute effectively to an understanding of the contemporary world.

It may be objected that the series attempts too much. The attempt is being made, however, on the assumption that any historical development should be susceptible of meaningful treatment on any scale and in the realization that a very large proportion of today’s college students do not have more time to invest in this part of their education. The practical alternative appears to lie between some attempt to create a new brief account of the history of our tradition and the abandonment of any serious effort to communicate the essence of that tradition to all but a handful of our students. It is the conviction of everyone contributing to this series that the second alternative must not be accepted by default.

In a series covering such a vast sweep of time, few scholars would find themselves at home thoroughly in the fields covered by more than one or two of the essays. This means, in practice, that almost every essay should be written by a different author. In spite of apparent drawbacks, this pro-procedure promises real advantages. Each contributor will be in a position to set higher standards of accuracy and insight in an essay encompassing a major portion of the field of his life's work than could ordinarily be expected in surveys of some ten or twenty centuries. The inevitable discontinuity of style and interpretation could be modified by editorial co-ordination; but it was felt that some discontinuity was in itself desirable. No illusion is more easily acquired by the student in an elementary course, or is more prejudicial to the efficacy of such a course, than that a single smoothly articulated text represents the very substance of history itself. If the shift from author to author, week by week, raises difficulties for the beginning student, they are difficulties that will not so much impede his progress as contribute to his growth.

In this essay, The Age of Power, Mr. Carl J. Friedrich and Mr. Charles Blitzer have produced a work as much of synthesis as of summary. Even though the seventeenth century was, as they say, the period during which "modern science, modern philosophy, and the modern state . . . all emerged," it has been studied less—except in the English field—than any other segment of European history since the end of the Middle Ages. Comprehensive surveys of the century have begun to appear only recently, and there are still no generally accepted—or even widely debated—interpretations of its historical development. The authors were, therefore, confronted with the necessity, hardly to be expected in a series such as this, of organizing a field of study at the same time as presenting it in a brief narrative essay. In response, they have not only produced an arresting thesis, but appropriately have traced its pattern in the bold outlines and highlighted its structure in the chiroscuro that were characteristic of the baroque style, which they adopted as the symbol of this turbulent and paradoxical age.
Foreword

The authors and the editor wish to express their gratitude for helpful suggestions to Mr. I. Bernard Cohen.

Ithaca, New York
March 1957

EDWARD WHITING FOX
Contents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Foreword, by Edward Whiting Fox</td>
<td>v</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I  The Pattern of Politics and Economics</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>II  The Baroque</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>III  The Power of Mind and Spirit</td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IV  The Thirty Years' War</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V  France: Absolute Power</td>
<td>97</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VI  England: Constitutional Power</td>
<td>119</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VII  Toward a New Balance of Power</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chronological Summary</td>
<td>189</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Suggestions for Further Reading</td>
<td>193</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Index</td>
<td>197</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>