SOME ASPECTS OF ANCIENT EGYPTIAN SEXUAL LIFE

BY

LISE MANNICHE
University of Copenhagen

With few exceptions, erotic aspects of the civilisation of ancient Egypt have been treated with the utmost discretion, the published comments most often reflecting the moral attitude of the authors or of their period, and not that of the ancient Egyptians themselves.

Wiedemann was the first to attempt a general discussion in 1920, followed by Keimer in 1941, and particular topics have since been treated by Montet (prohibitions) in 1950, and by Deakin and Goedicke (homosexuality) in 1965 and 1967. A short but comprehensive account of sexual life was given by Yoyotte in 1959, and de Rachewiltz (1963) elaborated on comparisons with other African cultures. A publication by Omlin of the erotic papyrus in Turin has recently appeared.

Although the material from ancient Egypt is scanty by comparison with that collected from other ancient civilisations, there are certain specific points that may be more closely documented.

For numerous suggestions and references I am indebted to Professor J. R. Harris who also provided the material for fig. 1 and pls. I–II (photographed by A. Bülow-Jacobsen).

1 A. Wiedemann, Das alte Ägypten, pp. 99–103.
5 In G. Posener (ed.), Dictionnaire de la civilisation égyptienne, s.v. érotisme.
6 B. de Rachewiltz, Eros nero (1963), translated as Black Eros (1969), to which reference is made below.
I. The attitude of the ancient Egyptians towards sex

The most explicit statement concerning the Egyptian attitude towards sexual behaviour refers not to the act itself, but to the circumstances, and is given by Herodotus:8 "The Egyptians were the first to make it a matter of religious observance not to have intercourse with women in temples nor to enter a temple without washing after being with a woman".

A temple was a place where physical purity was the rule, at least for those allowed to go beyond the forecourt (only priests and high officials were allowed to do so). That intercourse makes a man impure and unfit to enter a holy place is well known in Islam, and it is undoubtedly the same idea that lies behind the ancient prohibition. That some women were allowed to be present with men in the temple is evident from Herodotus’ remark, and if those with whom a man might have intercourse were ordinary women coming from outside it is not easy to imagine the circumstances, unless they were prostitutes seeking their clientele in the crowd. It is far more likely that members of the female staff of the temple are meant, though whether temple prostitutes existed, as elsewhere in the Near East, in ancient Greece, and in India,9 cannot be ascertained on the basis of the available material, which is practically non-existent.10 Herodotus has another important observation in I,182, namely that the woman who slept in the temple at Thebes had no intercourse with men. The woman in question was undoubtedly the hmt nfr, the "god’s wife". The gods, particularly the ithyphallic Amūn, also had a harim consisting of ħnrwt, but there is no indication that these women ever had intercourse with anyone in this function.11

That intercourse in holy places was considered unseemly at a 8 II, 64: the translation is that of A. D. Godley, Loeb Classical Library.

10 The ptolemaic "Bes chambers" found at Saqqara suggest that erotic activities may have taken place under the protection of this god of physical love: J. E. Quibell, Excavations at Saqqara 1905–06, pp. 12–14.

11 Cf., however, Strabo, XVII, 46, discussed by Blackman, JEA, VIII (1922), pp. 19–20. The ħnrwt of the royal harim were undoubtedly less chaste.
much earlier date appears from the text of the Book of the Dead, where the negative confession includes a statement that "I did not fornicate in the sacred places of the god of my town".12

The Egyptians knew that pregnancy resulted from intercourse, or rather from the introduction of semen into the woman's body, whether through the vagina, the anus, the mouth, or the ear.13 Procreation was a necessity of life,14 but the existence of various contraceptives suggests that this was not the only purpose of the act.15 That it was also performed for pleasure is evident from many literary references,16 and from the fact that one of the words used was nqmnqm, though mostly when a god was involved.17

As far as extra-marital intercourse and adultery are concerned, there is universal condemnation, except for a reference to the king in the Pyramid Texts.18 The result was fatal to the woman, and only in the Late Period could she escape by being divorced.19 Men were advised against it,20 just as they were also recommended

17 Wb. II, 381.
18 PT 510.
19 Wife slain and thrown to the dogs: Two Brothers (cf. n. 16); wife burnt and ashes thrown into river: Webaoner's wife (cf. n. 16; on the burning of the victim cf. G. A. Wainwright, The Sky-Religion in Egypt, pp. 55, 56–7, 89). Cf. also Herodotus, II, 111; for divorce see P. W. Pestman, Marriage and Matrimonial Property in Ancient Egypt (1961), pp. 55–6.
20 P. Anii (cf. n. 14); Instructions of Onkhsheshonqy (cf. n. 14), cols. 21, 18–9, to abstain from relations with prostitutes. The disaster into which a man can be led by women who want money in exchange for their favours is described in the story of Setne.

II. Homosexuality

The question of homosexuality in ancient Egypt has been discussed in various places. The sources themselves mainly refer to homosexuality performed as an act of violence against an enemy. This phallic aggression was not merely considered as a humiliation: the implanting of semen in the body of another man was equivalent to gaining power over him. Homosexual activities for pleasure are much less well attested, almost the only example being the adventure of king Neferkarê with his general, and a fragmentary reference to the feelings of Seth when being attacked by Horus for the other reason.

Pederasty was condemned in wisdom literature, and was included in the negative confession in the Book of the Dead, as well as being explicitly forbidden in some nomes.

Of female homosexuality, commonly called lesbianism, there is but little evidence in ancient Egypt. A text of the Book of the Dead written for a woman contains the above-mentioned negative confession, but the text was in all probability copied from a "male"

21 Instructions of Onkhsheshonqy, col. 22,6 (?).
22 F. L. Griffith, Stories of the High Priests of Memphis (1900), pp. 32f.
23 Cf. n. 4. It may be noted that in Old Testament legislation homosexuality was a crime punishable by death, whereas the Hittites apparently did not object to it: H. A. Hoffner, in Orient and Occident: Essays ... Gordon, p. 81 and pp. 83, 85.
25 Translated by Posener, RdE, XI (1957), p. 130.
26 F. L. Griffith, Hieratic Papyri from Kahun and Gurob (1898), pl. 3, l. 36.
27 Ptahotpe maxim 32 (cf. n. 4: Goedicke); Instructions of Onkhsheshonqy, col. 13,24 (cf. n. 14).
29 F. L. Griffith, Two Hieroglyphic Papyri from Tanis, (1889), pl. XI; cf. n. 3.
version, implying an act of sexual aggression. A passage in a dream book dealing with the dreams of women runs as follows: “If a woman has intercourse with her, she will experience a bad fate”, proving at least that the possibility was recognized.

Dildoes—artificial phalli for sexual satisfaction—were well known in classical Greece. The Egyptian sources, however, are silent on the subject. Artificial phalli were made, but they were votive objects with a magical purpose, and in the Plutarch version of the Osiris legend the phallus of Osiris was lost and replaced by an identical image to be honoured and carried in processions. It is likely that dildoes—manufactured or natural (i.e. suitably shaped vegetables)—were not uncommon in a country where the harim institution flourished, but there is no definite evidence for their use either by couples or by individuals. The Turin erotic papyrus, however, shows a related means of achieving sexual satisfaction. In one of the scenes the girl is depicted painting her lips, with a mirror and a tube for lip-paint in the other hand. She is squatting with her legs apart on top of, or immediately behind, a vase with a conical bottom, the tip of which is in contact with her pudenda. The man kneels beside her, holding the vase with one hand, while with the other he points to her private parts. There can be little doubt that the vase was meant to fulfil the purpose of a dildo.

III. Unnatural intercourse

Herodotus tells an anecdote about intercourse with an animal in Egypt: “In my lifetime a monstrous thing happened in this 31 P. Carlsberg XIII, b 2,33 (ms. 2nd cent. A.D. or later): A. Volten, Demotische Traumdeutung (1942).

33 E. Naville, The XIth Dynasty Temple at Deir el Bahari, III (1913), pp. 30 and 31.
34 De Iside et Osiride, § 36.
35 Turin erotic papyrus: Omlin, op. cit., pl. V (left).
36 Cf. a similar representation on a Greek vase painting: G. Vorberg, Ars erotica veterrum, pl. XXII.
province (Mendes), a woman having open intercourse with a he-goat*. Herodotus calls it a "monstrous thing" (τέρας), but it should be borne in mind that the he-goat was a sacred animal (as he himself says), and that the performance would therefore have had a religious significance. As the generative power of the New Apis bull was strengthened by women exposing themselves in front of it (Diodorus, I, 85) the sacred goat might thus prove his virility.

Intercourse with animals existed in the imagination of the Egyptians, if not in reality. A dream book, probably from the reign of Ramesses III, envisages the combination of man/jerboa, man/kite, and man/pig. Another dream book, written 1500 years later, deals with the dreams of a woman. The species of animal with which she might have intercourse in a dream are numerous: mouse, horse, donkey, goat, ram, wolf, lion, crocodile, snake, baboon, ibis, and falcon. In most cases it is taken to mean that something bad will happen to her.

The idea of intercourse with an animal, specifically with a donkey, also occurs in another context, namely as a curse: "May a donkey copulate with his wife and his children". This apparently inspired the maker of a faience figurine now in Berlin that represents a donkey mounting a woman from behind. The donkey was associated with Seth and thus symbolized evil, as well as being an animal of aggressive sexuality.

Another form of unnatural intercourse attributed to the Egyptians is necrophilia. When speaking of mummmification, Herodotus says*: "Wives of notable men, and women of great beauty and reputation, are not at once given over to the embalmers, but only after they have been dead three or four days; this is done

---

39 P. Carlsberg XIII, b 2, 17–18, 20–30 (cf. n. 31). In Old Testament legislation intercourse with animals merited execution: H. A. Hoffner, in Orient and Occident: Essays ..., Gordon, p. 81. In Hittite legal texts, on the other hand, there is a distinction depending upon the kind of animal. If a man had sexual relations with a cow, a sheep, a pig, or a dog he was guilty, and worthy of death, but relations with a horse or a mule were not considered illegal: ibid., p. 82.
40 W. Spiegelberg, RT, XXV (1903), p. 192.
41 E. Brunner-Traut, Die altägyptischen Scherbenbilder (1956), Abb. 17, p. 60.
that the embalmers may not have carnal intercourse with them. For it is said that one was found having intercourse with a woman newly dead, and was denounced by this fellow-workmen."

At a different level, the novelist Xenophon of Ephesus relates

2 Acta Orientalia, XXXVIII
how a man kept the mummified body of his wife in his bedroom,\textsuperscript{43} though why he did so is open to interpretation.

In the first case it is implied that intercourse took place before mummification, and several extant mummies actually show signs of advanced decomposition, the bodies having been left for some time before being treated.\textsuperscript{44} The second reference may suggest the practice of necrophilia with a mummified body.

That a man might keep his sexual power after his death is well attested in Egyptian funerary belief, and above all in the Osiris legend. The \textit{ba} of the deceased was conceived as his agent in sexual activities, and was thus a danger to the living.\textsuperscript{45}

\textbf{IV. The positions of intercourse}

Owing to the doubtful statistical value of the very limited evidence, it is hardly possible to form any definite general conclusions as to the habits of the ancient Egyptians when performing intercourse. There are, however, certain indications as to what the Egyptians considered the normal position. In a text to the glorification of Osiris, written in the XXVIth dynasty, it is said: “I am thy sister Isis. There is no other god or goddess who has done what I have done. I have played the part of a man though I am a woman, in order to make thy name live on earth, since thy divine seed was in my body”.\textsuperscript{46} This clearly refers to the union of Isis with her husband after the death of the latter. His body was cut to pieces and scattered all over Egypt, but Isis managed to assemble it. Although Plutarch claims that the male member was missing,\textsuperscript{47} another authority of more ancient date relates that it was found.\textsuperscript{48} Osiris, however, was not able to proceed in the usual way, and it was Isis herself “who revived what was faint for the Weary One (Osiris), who took in his seed \textsuperscript{43} V, 10-11.

\textsuperscript{44} G. Elliot Smith & W. R. Dawson, \textit{Egyptian Mummies} (1924), pp. 125–6.
\textsuperscript{45} L. V. Žabkar, \textit{A Study of the Ba Concept in Ancient Egyptian Texts} (1968), pp. 101-3.
\textsuperscript{46} P. Louvre 3079, col. 110,10; cf. A. Klasens, \textit{A Magical Statue Base} (1952), pp. 74.
\textsuperscript{47} Cf. n. 34.
\textsuperscript{48} J. Vandier, \textit{Le papyrus Junihac} (1962), IV,16 and 21 (lower) (ms. ptole.)
and provided an heir". How she did this is not infrequently represented in a symbolic manner: Isis rests on the abdomen of Osiris in the shape of a bird with outstretched wings or, more clearly—the Osiris-legend being transferred to private persons—as a woman. Already in the Pyramid Texts it is said: "You (Osiris) have placed her (Isis) on your phallus and your seed goes into her", so that from earliest times this was the way

---

49 Stela C 256 in the Louvre (XVIII dyn.); cf. BIFAO, LIII (1953), p. 19, n. 1.
50 See E. Otto & M. Hirmer, Osiris und Amun (1966), pl. 17 (temple of Sethos I at Abydos), pl. 20 (Hathor temple at Dendera: Ptol. X – Cleopatra VII), and pls. 18–9 (Osiris bed in Cairo: XXVI dyn.).
51 Stela 1372 in the British Museum, and a Berlin sarcophagus (both MK); cf. BIFAO, L.III (1953), pp. 19–24.
52 PT 632 b-c.
in which it was imagined that Isis and Osiris united to create Horus. When the later text has Isis say: "I have played the part of a man", it can only be understood that it was the opposite position that was usual, i.e. with the man on top of the woman, both of them lying down face-to-face. A hieroglyph at Beni Hasan shows this simple position, but is the only clear illustration of it.\textsuperscript{53}

A variant of the face-to-face posture may have been considered equally "normal", the woman in this case lying with legs sprawled.\textsuperscript{54} In the Roman world this was apparently the preferred position.\textsuperscript{55} Another variant shows the woman reclining with one leg outstretched, and the other on the shoulder of the man.\textsuperscript{56} A well-executed figurine of blue glazed faience (length 4.5 cm)

\textsuperscript{53} Lepsius, Denkmäler, II, pl. 143a/b (XI dyn.).
\textsuperscript{54} Sami Gabra & E. Drioton, Peintures à fresques et scènes peintes à Hermopolis-ouest (1954), pl. XII.
\textsuperscript{55} Ovid, Ars amatoria, III, 787–8.
\textsuperscript{56} Turin erotic papyrus: Omlin, \textit{op. cit.}, pl. IX (left).
Figure 4. Graffito in an unnumbered tomb at Deir el-Bahari.

represents a woman lying on her left side, supporting her head with her arm and embracing a sitting man with her legs (pls. I–II). Other possibilities included the woman seated on a chair and the man standing in front of her\textsuperscript{57} (fig. 1), or the woman embracing the neck of the man with her legs, he kneeling in front of her\textsuperscript{58} (fig. 2). This latter may indeed have been a particularly common Egyptian position since it is represented in several sketches.

Among other face-to-face positions was the simple one with the couple standing.\textsuperscript{59} In the Turin erotic papyrus the imaginative couple are trying out variants with the man carrying the girl seated on his lap,\textsuperscript{60} and—recalling the Isis inversion—the man reclining on the ground with the woman standing above him.\textsuperscript{61}

\textsuperscript{57} Ibid., pl. V (middle); sketch on a fragment found in the tomb of Puyemrê: see fig. 1 (from a tracing made by Davies, now apparently lost; the fragment was noted as being from a coffin, but this seems a little unlikely).

\textsuperscript{58} Ostracon Cairo 11198: see fig. 2 (from a photograph taken by the late Dr. Ramadân Saad), cf. de Rachewiltz, op. cit., fig. on p. 60; Keimer, op. cit. (cf. n. 2), no. 14; Turin erotic papyrus: Omlin, op. cit., pl. I, lower, 3rd scene from the left.

\textsuperscript{59} Keimer, op. cit., no. 15.

\textsuperscript{60} Turin erotic papyrus: Omlin, op. cit., pl. VI (right).

\textsuperscript{61} Ibid., pl. VII (left).
Here one is strongly reminded of representations of Nut bending over Geb, who is occasionally shown with an erect phallus.\footnote{Papyrus of Tameniut (British Museum); cf. V. Ions, Egyptian Mythology, fig. on p. 46. For the symbolism cf. R. T. R. Clark, Myth and Symbol in Ancient Egypt (1959), p. 50.}

The Turin erotic papyrus illustrates an agitated variant of the face-to-face position: the man stands, pulling the hair of the girl, who seems to have been caught while performing a dance. Her right hand rests on a lyre, and her left supports the heel of her left leg, raised above the head of the man, while her right leg is bent.\footnote{Turin erotic papyrus: Omlon, op. cit., pl. IX (right).}

Intercourse from behind ("dog-fashion") also seems to have been rather popular in Egypt, to judge from the number of extant representations of this position, the man most frequently standing, with the woman bending over\footnote{Ostracon BM 50714: see fig. 3 (from de Rachewiltz, op. cit., p. 63); grafitto in tomb at Deir el Bahari: see fig. 4 (from a photograph taken by the late Dr. Ramadán Saad); Turin erotic papyrus: Omlon, op. cit., pl. VIII (left); Sami Gabra & E. Drioton, loc. cit. (cf. n. 54); de Rachewiltz, op. cit., fig. 44 (bottom left).} (figs. 3, 4). Whether any of these examples indicate anal intercourse cannot be determined from the representations alone, but it seems rather unlikely in that no practical purpose would have been served (cf. the Egyptians' beliefs concerning conception). The only literary reference to coitus from behind occurs in a story where Anat is attacked by Seth while bathing in a river: "He (beheld Seth as he mounted?) upon her back, leaping (her) even as a ram leaps",\footnote{P. Chester Beatty VII, 1. 5 (ms. Ramesses II): Gardiner, Hieratic Papyri in the British Museum, p. 62.} etc. In a note on this passage Dawson says\footnote{JEA, XXII (1936), p. 107, n. 4. J. G. Griffiths, The Conflict of Horus and Seth (1960), p. 42, n. 5, appears to have missed the point, since he refers to the "abnormal" way of intercourse.} that defloration resulted, but this is nowhere explicitly stated. Te Velde\footnote{H. te Velde, Seth, God of Confusion (1967), p. 37.} stresses the fact that the attacked goddess was dressed like a man, and that Seth's desire was thus of a homosexual nature. The goddess, however, was bathing at the time and would presumably have been only partly dressed, if not completely naked. Unless, therefore, Seth was attracted by the idea of her when dressed (as a man), it is more likely that her feminine attributes aroused his desire. He was certainly not homosexual only, but bisexual, as shown by his attraction to Isis, and it is just as likely that he performed normal coitus a tergo as coitus per annum. This will also apply to the representations of ordinary couples.

Other examples of intercourse from behind show the woman crouching on the ground or on a bed, or bending with her head touching the ground. An acrobatic performance a tergo is also given by the couple in the Turin papyrus: the woman drives a chariot drawn by two girls, while the man copulates with her.

---

68 P. Chester Beatty I, 6,4f. (ed. Gardiner).
69 de Rachewiltz, op. cit., p. 45 (bottom); R. Anthes, Mit Rahineh 1956, no. 210; and others.
70 Turin erotic papyrus: Omlin, op. cit., pl. IV (right).
ROMAN ATTITUDES TO GREEK LOVE

The easier parts of the story of Rome's Hellenization over the period from Plautus on have been often told: literary genres and philosophy were taken over and a mythology developed. Various arts were copied. Other parts are seldom surveyed. Some day, someone, writing the right book, will crack open the great eggshell still called "Roman civilization" and show us in full the Greco-Roman creature that we all know lies within; and we can then properly study the nature and origins of its hyphenation.

To illustrate the process of Hellenization, we have the younger Scipio's remarks on the novelties he had observed and reports on in 129 B. C. Speaking of the young in the city, he says:

They learn shameful arts. Along with ballet-boys (cinaedi), and carrying their violins and saxophones (sambuca psalterioque), they attend the entertainers' schools; they learn singing - all these things that our ancestors wanted to be judged disgraceful, for freeborn persons. They attend, I repeat, the very dancing schools - unwed girls and freeborn lads among the ballet-boys. Though someone might have reported these doings to me, I could not have taken in the notion of noblemen instructing their own offspring in these things. Yet, when I was conducted to a dancing school, by Jove, there I saw more than fifty lads and maids in the school, one of them a boy (and this caused me the sharpest pain, on our state's behalf), a boy marked out as noble (bullatum), son of a candidate for public office, under twelve years of age, dancing to castanets such a dance as some shameless slave could not decently have performed.¹

Some years earlier Scipio had also described P. Sulpicius Gallus, homo delicatus: "For one who daily perfumes himself and dresses before a mirror, whose eyebrows are trimmed, who walks abroad with beard plucked out and thighs made smooth, who at banquets, though a young man, has reclined in a long-sleeved tunic ["called 'chirodotae'", explains our source] on the inner side of the couch with a lover, who is fond not only of wine but of men - does anyone doubt that he does what ballet-boys commonly do?"²

Emphatic passages; reminders, however, that the state contained not only Scipio and those fellow-citizens he thought he was addressing, but a prominent and opposed group living a life in certain respects provocatively at odds with his own. It would be a great mistake, then, to say that 'Romans' had been gradually picking up the new ways. Some Romans had; some, angrily and bitterly, had not. In Scipio's day as in any other, society was divided into more or less encapsulated groups and strata, by no means approving of each other's behavior.

¹ Macrobi. 3.14.7. (And here at the outset I thank G. Williams for helpful comments).
² Aul. Gell. 6.12.2 = ORF² 1.127, of 142 B. C.